idly on Zuroweste's discovery request for six months and then waiting until mere days before trial to locate and disclose ... recorded statements made by Zuroweste is the antithesis of the diligence and good faith requirement of (the discovery rules)."

Warren County Prosecuting Attorney Kelly King said court rules expect the prosecutor's office to know of the existence of any evidence in the possession of law enforcement. However, she said reality doesn't always match that expectation.

"When you're talking about jail calls, it's not uncommon for a defendant to make literally hundreds of calls while incarcerated. There is simply no way to listen to every phone call in every case," King said. "It's important to note that in this case, we did not hold on to the phone calls and wait to disclose them. They were turned over to the defense as soon as we were made aware of them."

Despite all the Supreme Court judges agreeing that a violation occurred, the court was split on how it should have been remedied.

Powell wrote the majority opinion for four judges who concurred that the prosecutor's violation wasn't serious enough to exclude the evidence from trial entirely. Another remedy could have been to request a delay of the trial date, Powell said.

But because Zuroweste's attorney did not specifically request such a delay before the trial, and failed to show end in a plea deal, and therefore which cases need to be prioritized in discovering evidence.

Stith interpreted that statement as an admission that Bailey knew evidence was being revealed late, in violation of court rules.

"If the prosecutor believed a case would be continued or result in a plea deal, he willfully chose to not comply with discovery requests," Stith wrote. "He argued it was the fault of defense counsels in general for not letting him know in advance whether they would be pleading guilty, so he would know in which cases he had to actually produce discovery and in which he could safely fail to follow the rules."

Stith and the two judges dissenting with her argued that a reversal of Zuroweste's conviction is warranted because the prosecutor's violation wasn't addressed in any way at trial. Not remedying this case tells prosecutors everywhere that if they violate discovery rules, there will be no consequences, Stith said.
