“...They would help figure out the appropriate way to move people around,” said Klinginsmith, “and if I knew nothing about agriculture and influenced me toward my future career.”

Christina Saenz watched her daughter shift toward a blossoming career in biology after County for Helping Build Confidence for a lifetime.

“We are still very much a farming community, said Saenz. “I just think it’s important for these kids to have an opportunity to learn where our food comes from and leadership skills. I’ve had a lot of friends say, ‘my kids wouldn’t be a part of anything if it wasn’t for agriculture.’ I just hate to see any of it go.”

Hall says he plans to speak at the R-III board meeting and encourage others to attend as well to voice their concern.

“I think by cutting down the amount of courses they’re going to but with ongoing financial setbacks related to COVID-19, it’s the current reality.

“This really is stemming around a funding issue,” said Klinginsmith. “It’s not because we don’t think they programs are worthwhile. We just don’t have the funds to operate the programs we’ve had.”

families in town that need help,” Schroeder said. “We have lots of low-income housing here that needs all the help it can get. The more people you have help, the better.”

The opportunity for the new food pantry location had eluded Wright City officials for many months. Everything from the former location was put into temporary storage in September when the pantry came up for a perfect building to move the food pantry to, I spoke with my wife, and we decided it was the right thing to do.”
